Town officials are entrusted with using taxpayer money for public good. The concept seems simple, but the devil is in the details. What constitutes the public or a public purpose, and who makes that determination? What, if any, system of checks and balances does the law have in place to ensure this, and what is an official's obligation when something seems askew? What are the consequences if, unwittingly or not, funds are misappropriated? This course will review these issues and provide the legal framework so your town can stay out of the newspaper and breathe a little easier when the comptroller's office comes to audit.
